Sociology Student Spotlight

KATIE FLYNN

Katie changed her major to sociology after taking the Sociology of Food in London. She said: “I truly fell in love with the idea of studying our world and the complex social processes within it.” Katie says she enjoys her sociology classes because “learning from professors who absolutely love what they are teaching allows them to bring forth interesting classroom experiences that I have rarely found elsewhere.”

Katie is particularly interested in researching heroin laws in different countries and the impact of these laws on arrest, conviction, and incarceration rates cross-nationally. She plans to attend law school after graduation and is interested in environmental law and public policy.

Congratulations, Katie!
